Canada tends to outscore and out-shoot their opponents on average. They generate a higher percentage of their shots from the slot than their opponents and complete more passes to the slot as well. They do have a lower percentage of shots on net.

Canada takes fewer penalties per game than their opponents do on average. Team Canada is efficient defensively on both puck recoveries and takeaways. Their opponents tend to have a lower pass success rate that Canada is able to take advantage of. They are strong on faceoffs, on average winning 22 and losing 17. We can see from their average zone entries being 59.7 relative to their opponent’s 47.5 that they tend to control possession for more of the game.

When looking at the events directly preceding a shot or goal, Canada does a good job creating offense directly off a puck recovery. This shows how quickly they can convert on a change of possession. It is also worth noting they generate fewer shots and goals directly from a zone entry compared to their opponents. This also means defensively they give up more shots directly after a zone entry; however, it is worth noting that this does not include zone entries where there is a pass and then a shot.

Canada	PP goals	Opportunities	Success Rate	Shots per opportunity	Recoveries per opportunity
Canada	9	55	0.16	3.64	1.56
Opponent	5	41	0.12	3.39	1.78

Canada has a higher success rate on the powerplay than their opponents. They generate more shots and have to recover the puck from their zone less often.

Canada’s strongest players offensively have been Poulin, Johnston, Daoust, and Jenner. Poulin is their leading scorer and touches the puck a significant amount. Johnston notably has a high number of zone entries and is someone to watch out for possession-wise. Fortino leads the way with their passes and puck recoveries.
